Module 6 Rationale

For my design docs, my choices changed quite a bit during the design process. Originally I had intended on using a solid colored background and having a more vibrant photo in the header as the main appeal to my page but when I was looking at examples of webpages made in Photoshop on the internet, I came across a template for a page that I really liked. The template had a gray, white and black colored photo with black watercolor edging around it and I really liked the idea of using one of my photos as the background for my entire site so I followed the template and created the design I have now. With that major change, I also changed my color scheme to include gray and white to blend in with the background.

I added a home button to my navigation because I forgot about that rather essential part to a website when making my first sketches. I think the layout of my pages was very similar to how I had first imagined them. I found that it was actually pretty easy and fun to think of how to design the smaller aspects as I went along. I really enjoyed looking at other examples and trying to make a version of it on my own.
